WONDERFUL PROGRESS IN TELEPHONY

While on Edison day the people of the United States were celebrating the thirty-sixth birthday of the electric light, great events were transpiring in other realms of science.

Sound—visible speech—was projected across the void which has the Atlantic to a foot; Washington talked to Paris, France.

The electric light has dissipated physical darkness and by so doing has made it possible for modest women to study at night; to advance knowledge, to broaden the scope of their understanding. Thus it is now dispelling mental darkness.

Individuals have progressed thus far merely for progress; for all the people advance would be slow not for the methods of quick communication. What one person conceives, another imparts upon the world to spread. The spirit of the land is expressed in higher ideals, greater accomplishments.

The telephone has become the great accelerator of progress. As advances in the use and extension of the radio of telephone service is gained, the benefits of this one greatest of all common utilities are compounded. The announcement of the fact that the Atlantic had been spanned and speech had been passed between Washington and Paris is likely to become epochal in history. It means the insertion into world affairs of the greatest possible influence toward a common language. No more potent element toward peace and understanding and appreciation between the isolated people of the earth could have been devised than that so recently brought into existence by Bell Telephone engineers.

NAVY ORDERS RECEIVED BY WIRELESS TELEPHONE

Reports received by Manager H. L. Blountwell of the Southwestern Telegraph and Telephone Company describe the experiment by which Secretary of the Navy Daniels communicated his first official order by wireless telephone to Admiral S. R. Tinker at the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

The words passed from the ordinary Bell telephone on the Secretary's desk over the wires to the wireless tower at Arlington, thence to New York by wireless and then by wire again to the Admiral. All of this was automatically accomplished by the recently developed apparatus of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. The foreshadowing thus when the Secretary of the Navy may hold conversations with the commanders of ships at sea just as he would with members of his family at home, explains Manager Blountwell.

"But that is not all. Design long and well be reading the words of those on sinking ships as they enter the thin air for the help which may or may not be forthcoming." When Jack Burns called help for the Republic we thought the hot mixture of science had been worked. Now think how it will be when the actual uses of the same will come to us through the ether and answers may be given as the crises go forth. Orders may be issued to full appreciation for all conditions and what was accomplished when the Republic sank will seem small in comparison as modern means are applied to the conditions of dire emergency.
